

the book deals with the treatment of ‘oral errors’ in language classrooms, Part IV considers the complexities of ‘classroom interaction’, and Part V examines ‘receptivity’ that summarizes the research on learners in terms of personal matters such as anxiety, competitiveness, motivation and self-esteem. For those who are working on classroom research, Part VI of this book will prove useful as it deals with the position that teachers may adopt to utilize classroom research in their own settings. Each chapter also has a summary, a discussion starter, suggestions for further reading, and a mini project section. Readers will especially find the section on discussion starters to be of great aid in relating the main points with their own experience. In addition, Appendix A-H on pages 202-223 also outlines a few systems and models of analysing classroom research.

A Course in Language Teaching: Practice and Theory

The best thing about Penny Ur’s A Course in Language Teaching is its comprehensiveness. Divided into a total of seven parts, the course book comprises 22 modules including practice activities, testing, reading, lesson-planning, teaching regular as well as large heterogeneous classes, and many others, with each module bearing a careful outline of both theoretical and practical aspects. Each module also has separate units outlining the following: i) input (background information essentially forming a summary of ideas that professionals, scholars and researchers have produced) ii) experiential work (tasks based on teaching/learning experiences, which may be based on lesson observation, classroom teaching, micro-teaching, peer-teaching and/or experiment) and iii) tasks which are aimed to provoke careful thinking about the issues and the formulation of personal theories with regard to language teaching. The different learning modes and defining concepts are lucidly explained in a short ‘Rationale’ section in the Introduction. The first two parts of the book comprise a total of seven units, which outline the basics of the teaching process and the components of teaching language. The basics of the teaching process in turn comprise presentation, practicing and testing, which correspond to the three strategies used by good learners trying to acquire a foreign language which are a) to perceive and understand new language, b) to learn it thoroughly and c) to check themselves. The components of teaching language comprise pronunciation, vocabulary, grammar and topics/situations/notions/functions; the ‘what’. The rest of the book deals with practical aspects of teaching language, course contents, etc. Teachers trying to teach a language in heterogeneous settings may find Part III (‘Teaching the language: The how’) and Part VI (‘Learner differences’) particularly useful. Ur’s insights drawn from personal experience, and the citation of practical examples based on the ‘reflective model’ in teaching language make this book a very handy companion for language teachers and educators. The simple layout of the book with its effective illustration also makes it very user-friendly. This book also has a ‘Further Reading/Teachers’ Handbook’ section at the end of each module which most readers will find extremely useful.
